Antifeminist mobilization in the United Nations: Between socialization and polarization

Conservative NGOs contesting women's rights in the United Nations are on the rise. This mobilization influenced the way gender politics is done in the UN. In our research, we study the characteristics of antifeminist politics, how and why these actors mobilize in the UN, and what are outcomes of this mobilization. We argue that antifeminist actors' politics can be characterized as backlash politics. Conservative NGOs' socialization into transnational practices and the United Nations has played a significant part in facilitating the antifeminist backlash. The chief effect of this kind of socialization is polarization which results from feminist NGOs' defensively reciprocating the attack from the antifeminist actors.
